

Millsaps College-Chism Strategies State of the State Survey

Summary of Findings

January 9, 2018

Mississippians are split on the direction of the state, and the split falls along partisan lines. Republicans view the state as heading in the right direction, 64%-16%. Democrats see the state as headed in the wrong direction, 63%-14% while independent voters also see the state heading in the wrong direction, 50%-25%. There are also sharp differences in the perceptions of voters of differing races with a majority of white voters suggesting the state is heading in the right direction, 52%-26% while African American voters believe the state is heading in the wrong direction, 55-21%. Additionally, voters between the ages of 18-44 were the most likely to say that the state is heading in the wrong direction while voters between 45-54 and those 65 and older were the most likely to say that the state is heading in the right direction.

Delbert Hosemann is the most popular elected official we asked voters about. Hosemann's approval sits at +34%. His approval among Republicans is +58%. Hosemann is particularly popular with older voters: voters age 55 and older approve of Hosemann 60%-19%. Among African American voters, Hosemann is the most popular of the Republican elected officials included in the survey. He also enjoys a +16 mark among independents.

State Treasurer Lynn Fitch* also drew high marks from voters. Her approval rating sits at +19% overall. Among Republican voters, 56% approve of Fitch's job performance, while 12% disapprove. Fitch's weakest evaluations come from voters between the ages of 18-34 (-11%) while her strongest evaluations are from voters between 45-54 (+29%).

Public Service Commissioner Brandon Presley is still a relatively unknown figure in the state, with 48% of voters saying they were unable to rate him. Still, Presley got impressive marks among Republican voters for a Democrat, with a +22% approval rating among GOP respondents. Presley is currently being courted by some Democrats in the state to run against Roger Wicker in next year's Senate race, and his popularity among Republicans suggests he could be a strong contender if he decides to run.

Roger Wicker's approval rating is at +11%. Among Republicans, 63% approve, while 21% disapprove. Wicker's likely 2018 primary challenger, Chris McDaniel, is slightly less popular than Wicker, with only a +7% approval rating overall and a +28% approval rating among Republicans. Still, less than half of all voters say they approve of Wicker's performance in Washington, and that is not where the senator would like to be as he gears up for reelection in 2018.

Only 20% of voters say they are definitely voting to reelect Wicker in 2018. Another 28% say they are probably voting for the incumbent senator. 38% say they are probably or definitely voting for someone else. Among Republicans, only 31% say they are definitely voting for Wicker, 35% say they will probably vote for him, and 20% say they are likely to vote for someone else. This suggests that while Republican voters approve of Wicker overall, they do not have strong feelings for the senator and would be willing to consider other options if Wicker faces a primary challenger in 2018.

The Mississippi Legislature—which convened the new 90-day session last week—is largely unpopular with voters. Collectively, the legislature’s approval rating is underwater at -12%. Voters across all ethnic, gender, and age groups disapprove of the legislature’s performance. Only those who identify as Strong Republicans give positive marks to the legislative branch of government.

Fixing our state’s roads and bridges was the top priority for respondents. 23% of respondents listed infrastructure as their top priority, followed by making health care more accessible and affordable at 21%. Health care was the top priority for African-Americans, while fixing roads and bridges was the top priority for white respondents. Making healthcare more affordable was also a much bigger issue for women in our survey, with 28% of female respondents listing it as their top priority, compared to just 13% of men. Men—and particularly white men—were much more likely to consider reducing the size of state government to be the most important issue: 20% of white men said reducing the size of government should be the top priority for our leaders in Jackson.

Mississippi voters overwhelmingly support creating a state lottery 69%-23%. This includes support from 62% of Republicans, 77% of Democrats, and 66% of independents. A slim majority of voters (51%) say the proceeds from the lottery should go to support public education, although this is considerably higher than the second most popular option of using the proceeds to fund roads and bridges (29%). Women were more likely to support using the proceeds for public schools by eleven points (54% for women, compared to 43% for men). A solid majority of African American voters (63%) and a plurality of white voters (44%) were also more likely to favor directing this new revenue to public schools than to other spending priorities.

Voters oppose authorizing a higher state gasoline tax to support infrastructure improvements, with 38% in support and 50% opposed. A plurality of Democrats (44%) said they would support the tax, compared to only 36% of Republicans and 31% of independents.

68% of voters said they think all school board members should be elected. 10% said they thought members should be appointed, while 14% thought they should vary by type of district. Republicans were slightly more likely to say school members should be elected (72%, compared to 62% of Democrats).

A majority of voters oppose reducing the cost of living adjustment for retirees from state and local government jobs. Voters age 18-54 were more likely to oppose the reduction (59% compared to 48% of voters 55 or older).
